Executive Insights in Insurance & Surety Bonding

How can subcontractor prequalification help reduce risk?

MATTHEW KELLY
PRESIDENT
PreQual

A subcontractor default can have devastating effects on a project and a general contractor's balance sheet. Implementing and executing a thorough prequalification program is a must to manage subcontractor exposure.

Projects are built off the backs of subcontractors' balance sheets.

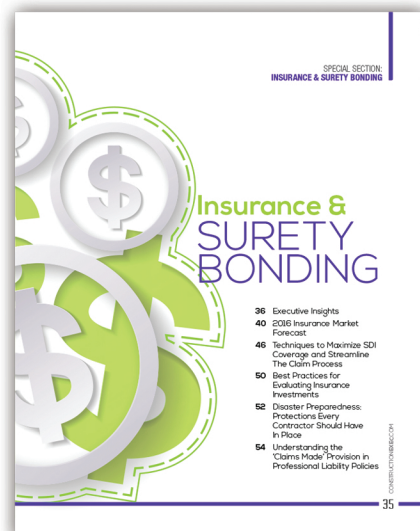

With subcontractors having to lay out significant money for labor and materials, there is tremendous pressure on their cash flow. This kind of pressure is only compounded in robust construction markets like the one we find ourselves in today.

Counter to popular belief, more subcontractors fail in the expansion of the construction market rather than the contraction, as more work applies greater pressure to their balance sheets.

Having a strong prequalification process allows general contractors to identify or recognize a subcontractor that is in trouble or heading for tough times. This simple process, if done correctly, can significantly mitigate risk and reduce failure.

Expert Analysts That Provide Greater Insight Into Subcontractor Performance Risk

CORPORATE PROFILE

Prevent Sub-Contractor Default & Vendor/Supplier Failure...

PERSONALIZED SERVICE, EXPERT ANALYSIS, DYNAMIC SOFTWARE

Subcontractor failure costs a contractor time, money and reputation. A strong prequalification program should mitigate the risks of failure by subcontractors, suppliers and vendors by identifying whether they have the financial strength, experience and reputation to perform the work.

PreQual solves the problem by marrying dynamic software with financial analysts to deliver expert level prequalifications. Our financial analysts provide insight into subcontractor performance risk and alleviate the burdensome administrative costs of managing the prequalification process, saving you time and money.

Contractors that perform prequalification in-house or as part of a subcontractor default insurance (SDI) program will greatly benefit from PreQual's experienced management team and streamlined process. PreQual isn't just software; it's a full-service company that offers knowledgeable staff and exceptional customer service.
